Mental Health Treatment in History

By Sara J. Murray

An excellent look at one practitioner during a time of great change in the mental health field. The story verifies that humankind draws strength from difficulty. Highly recommended for anyone interested in the history of the treatment of mental illness.

Brilliant...even for this century

By R. Delrio

This book is a brilliant analysis of a general practitioner in the 40s and 50s who worked in mental institutions. In the 40s, the general practice was to perform frontal lobotomies to correct mental instability. Dr. Ferguson was one of the few physicians who followed up on his patients and discovered that the lobotomies were not correcting the situation.

He became an alcoholic. Through the recovery process of his alcoholism, he decided to return to the area of psychophysiology, and learn ways around performing lobotomies.

He was one of the first to discover that several of his patients were having mental problems because of vitamin deficiencies. He was also one of the first to use a new product called Ritalin (by Ciba) to correct catatonia...and it worked.

It's because of pioneering men like Dr. Ferguson, that we have gone beyond the ice pick age of lobotomies, into the century of curing the mind through curing the body.
