By the light of dawn, over steaming cups of tea, a daughter invokes the past and a mother opens her heart. Mumbai Mornings is centered mostly on conversations between Saya and her mother. As her mother's stories about relatives long relegated to memory, unfold, it soon becomes clear to Saya that no life is ordinary. Etched in grim reality, touched with compassion, Mumbai Mornings moves seamlessly from present to past, casting an unsparing eye on the frailties and foibles of fathers and daughters, sons and lovers. In the end, this is a book about vulnerable, ambitious men and women striving for beauty and longing for redemption.

A very good book. It's a work of fiction that gives you an insight on the realities that people actually face while beautifully depicting the relationship between a Mother and her Daughter.

A must read !

By LifeIsGood

I seldom read a book twice, but in the case of P.A. Chawla's "Mumbai Mornings" I made an exception. The first time I raced through it, eager to see how the next story would unfold. But I read it a second time to explore all the nuances, enjoying it slowly as one would sipping a steaming hot cup of tea, much like the author did with her mother. The stories themselves roll out with ease and some even have subtle twists. They are diverse and colorful, and provide an intimate glimpse into the mother-daughter relationship, extended families and their dynamics, Asian Indian culture and general human trials and triumphs. I particularly appreciated the quotes at the beginning of each chapter, and would often go back and re-read each after I'd read that chapter, to get a deeper appreciation. Chawla uses words as a canvas to so beautifully describe settings and emotions so that the reader can easily feel themselves transported into the stories. This is definitely a gem of a book, and I would highly recommend it.

An anytime novel

Mumbai Mornings is the second book of Chawla's that I have read, and I have to say I truly enjoyed it just as much as her first! It's a set of individual stories that the character, Saya, hears from her mother for the first time. Chawla has this keen ability to make you feel like you are standing right there next to her characters while some superbly dramatic (and often rather thought provoking) events unfold. Her descriptions are enough to bring you to the giant that is India (a character in itself) and make you feel right at home..."There was only the sound of our footfalls on the matted grass and the rarefied air blowing hither and thither, whispering through bamboo forests, gathering the scent of wild roses and circulating hymns of joy along the surrounding lakes." Beautiful. I highly recommend this quick and nourishing read.
